This practically-oriented workshop investigates how the dying and death of a loved one can pose the mourner with challenging demands stemming from a mixture of loss and trauma. Most deaths involve some combination of the two. Depending upon the amount of trauma experienced, the ensuing combination of grief and traumatic stress can severely disable coping, impair functioning, and compromise adaptation. Drawing on cutting-edge information from the fields of clinical psychology, thanatology, and traumatology, Dr. Rando provides strategies and specific guidelines for effective clinical intervention.
